

English Majors Interested in Publishing

English 3011C Publishing is designed for upper level students interested in career possibilities in writing and editing, in short, writing for money. Students will be asked to analyze the various formats common in public relations and journalism like the public relations release, the interview, and the news story, and to write samples of each. We will use the computer lab for an introduction to PageMaker and to HTML and Web Publishing. In addition, we will examine the availability of jobs in the industry and study the structure of and changes in both book and magazine publishing. The course will rely heavily on student participation and will be writing intensive.

Supplemental information on types of jobs, preparation required, and employment possibilities will be provided by guest speakers.

Publishing 3011C provides good preparation for internships in business, publishing, public relations, or journalism. We will learn PageMaker - some Journalism courses teach Quark - both programs are useful. Besides Journalism courses, other useful offerings are English 3601 (The English Language), English 3603 (The History of the English Language), or English 3692 (Grammar).

Students can also work at (or volunteer at) The Daily Campus, where they can gain valuable experience in editing and page layout.

More information about the English Department is available on our web page <http://english.uconn.edu/>.